

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!

SOAPSTONE

People have quarried soapstone for thousands of years. Native Americans in eastern North America used the soft rock to make bowls, cooking slabs, smoking pipes, and ornaments as early as the Late Archaic Period. Native Americans on the west coast traveled in canoes from the mainland to San Clemente Island to obtain soapstone for cooking bowls and effigy carving as early as 8000 years ago!